Competencies for Gerontological Counseling Feb 18 2020

Gerontological counseling as a counseling specialty spans only 20 years. This text incorporates into its framework the 16 Minimum Essential Competencies of gerontological counseling that have been developed over the past two decades. These competencies focus on the knowledge and skills required to be an effective counselor for older persons and their families. Each competency was developed with broad-based input from counselors, counselor educators, and personnel working directly with older persons. The book tries to provide a foundation of the knowledge and skills required in an accredited training program in gerontological counseling. Each chapter begins with a restatement of the specialty competency, followed by an overview of the chapter's contents. Important terms are defined, and the knowledge and skills required for a competent gerontological counselor are described. One or more case studies are provided, along with commentary, in which the knowledge and skills may be applied. Each chapter ends with a series of questions for consideration and discussion. Some of the competencies addressed include development and transition in later life, social and cultural foundations of aging, roles for counselors, and group work with older persons. Includes an index and a supplemental reading list. (RJM)

Professional Orientation to Counseling Mar 21 2020 First published in 2001. Routledge is an imprint of Taylor & Francis, an informa company.

Counselor Viewpoints on the Formation of Theoretical Orientation Nov 16 2019 A key task in the professional development of counselors is the formation and refinement of their theoretical orientation, a framework based in theories of counseling and psychotherapy which helps one to understand human behavior and guide the therapeutic process. This study sought to explore counselor viewpoints on the current stage of their theoretical orientation formation, find common viewpoints among counselors about this process, and understand if there are any demographic similarities among counselors with a similar viewpoint. To examine if there were any commonalities in viewpoint between counselors of similar specialties, practicing counselors and counseling students from the school counseling and clinical mental health counseling specialties were recruited. In addition, to examine if there were any commonalities based on level of experience in the counseling profession, participants were recruited from five experience levels: the first half of one's graduate program, the second half of one's graduate program, early in one's career as a practicing counselor (years 1-5), the middle of one's career (years 6-15), and an advanced stage in one's career (over 15 years). To understand this process, this study utilized Q methodology, a hybrid quantitative and qualitative approach which explores human subjectivity (Brown, 2012; Newman & Ramlo, 2017; Watts & Stenner, 2012). In this methodology, participants are shown a series of statements, in this case 54 statements derived from previous research describing various elements which can influence the formation of one's theoretical orientation. In this study, 32 practicing counselors and counseling students were asked to sort these statements based on their agreement or disagreement with each statement onto a forced-choice distribution grid. Then, the overall sorting pattern of these statements was analyzed using an inverse factor analysis process unique to Q methodology studies which showed correlations between the viewpoints of all of the participants and helped to determine common viewpoints, referred to as typologies in Q methodology studies, among the participants. Five distinct typologies were identified. Typology 1 included participants who demonstrated confidence in one's practices and a preference for a core theory upon which one could integrate a variety of techniques. In Typology 2, participants demonstrated a struggle to balance one's desire for finding a theory to express oneself with a feeling that one should be prepared with the perfect theory for every situation. Participants in Typology 3 focused on the value of well-established theories based in scientific principles. Those in Typology 4 valued using a variety of theories and learning through social interaction. Finally, participants in Typology 5 indicated a need for growth through education and experience. No statistically significant connections were found between any of the typologies and the demographics of counseling specialty area or experience level, but some observable patterns are detailed. Implications for the counseling profession and counseling education are discussed and recommendations are made for future studies.

Counseling psychologists have led the field of professional psychology in many areas including psychotherapy, supervision, vocational psychology, consultation, the promotion of human strengths, and the use of humanistic and empowering approaches to mental health promotion and treatment. As such, the specialization may be one of the broadest, most flexible, and widely applicable specialties in the field of applied and professional psychology. In Specialty Competencies in Counseling Psychology, Fuertes, Spokane, and Holloway provide a striking balance of the rich history of the counseling specialty and a thorough articulation of the professional practice domains conducted by the counseling psychology specialist. The authors deliver informative examples of each foundational and functional domain of competency as well as a comprehensive discussion of the historic roots that support the specialty's leadership role in professional psychology. In addition to interested individuals who wish to learn about the specialization of counseling psychology, readers from all specialties who are committed to developing professional competencies in psychotherapy assessment and intervention, supervision, vocational psychology, consultation, and contemporary issues having to do with human diversity and multiculturalism will also be served well by reading this volume. In order to assist such readers, the authors successfully capture how counseling psychology interfaces and overlaps with the other psychology specialties yet also distinguishes itself from them. Series in Specialty Competencies in Professional Psychology Series Editors

Arthur M. Nezu and Christine Maguth Nezu As the field of psychology continues to grow and new specialty areas emerge and achieve recognition, it has become increasingly important to define the standards of professional specialty practice. Developed and conceived in response to this need for practical guidelines, this series presents methods, strategies, and techniques for conducting day-to-day practice in any given psychology specialty. The topical volumes address best practices across the functional and foundational competencies that characterize the various psychology specialties, including clinical psychology, cognitive and behavioral psychology, school psychology, geropsychology, forensic psychology, clinical neuropsychology, couples and family psychology, and more. Functional competencies include common practice activities like assessment and intervention, while foundational competencies represent core knowledge areas such as ethical and legal issues, cultural diversity, and professional identification. In addition to describing these competencies, each volume provides a definition, description, and development timeline of a particular specialty, including its essential and characteristic pattern of activities, as well as its distinctive and unique features. Written by recognized experts in their respective fields, volumes are comprehensive, up-to-date, and accessible. These volumes offer invaluable guidance to not only practicing mental health professionals, but those training for specialty practice as well.
